Are you a young designer or architect and want to heighten your own professional development and creative competence? Apply to participate in the 24 Hour Inclusive Design Challenge today and be part of an exciting, educational and innovative experience like no other!

Over a period of two days, 4 teams of designers, architects, business representatives, students and users will work together to come up with inclusive, mainstream solutions in response to a design brief given to them. This year, the theme of the challenge is everyday technology for all.

The purpose of the challenge is to demonstrate the impact of involving a diversity of users in the process when developing new products, services or environments.

For the challenge participants, the main goal is knowledge transfer and competence building by challenging designers creatively and professionally, helping them acquire new practical skills and competence within the field of Inclusive Design.

This is a unique opportunity to gather designers, business, architects and users who have not worked together before, and to establish new networks and connections with like-minded individuals!

When: May 11–13 (two full days + an introduction May 11)

Where: The Norwegian Centre for Design and Architecture in Oslo

It is free to participate in the Challenge
